

Getting to Population Health

Program Overview

Many organizations have embraced population health management as the path to delivering better health outcomes at lower cost. For many, however, translating that to action is still a work in process. Adopting a new business model has far-reaching implications for quality and cost management, payment mechanisms, and relationships with physicians. Based on his client work and Numerof's National Survey of the State of Population Health, Michael Abram highlights the roadmap to population health, and the challenges involved in implementing a value-based care delivery model.

Program Objectives

At the completion of this program, the participants will be able to:

- ☑ Identify why population health is gaining traction as a way to increase health outcomes and reduce costs
- ☑ Articulate the seven steps required to get to population health
- ☑ Anticipate common implementation challenges and how to overcome them

About the Speaker

Michael Abrams is co-founder and Managing Partner of Numerof & Associates, a strategy development and implementation consulting firm. Michael brings more than 25 years of experience working across healthcare - from providers and payers to pharmaceutical and medical device manufacturers.

Michael and his firm help health systems perform better today with processes built for tomorrow. He has guided delivery organizations to improve service line performance, manage variation in cost and quality, tell a differentiated value story, and implement value-based care and payment models, including bundled payment and population health.

Michael also spearheaded Numerof's work on a comprehensive national survey on the state of population health in the US, which will be the focus of this session.

Who Should Attend

This webinar targets executive leadership, service line management and others with operational responsibility in making population health work in the organization.
